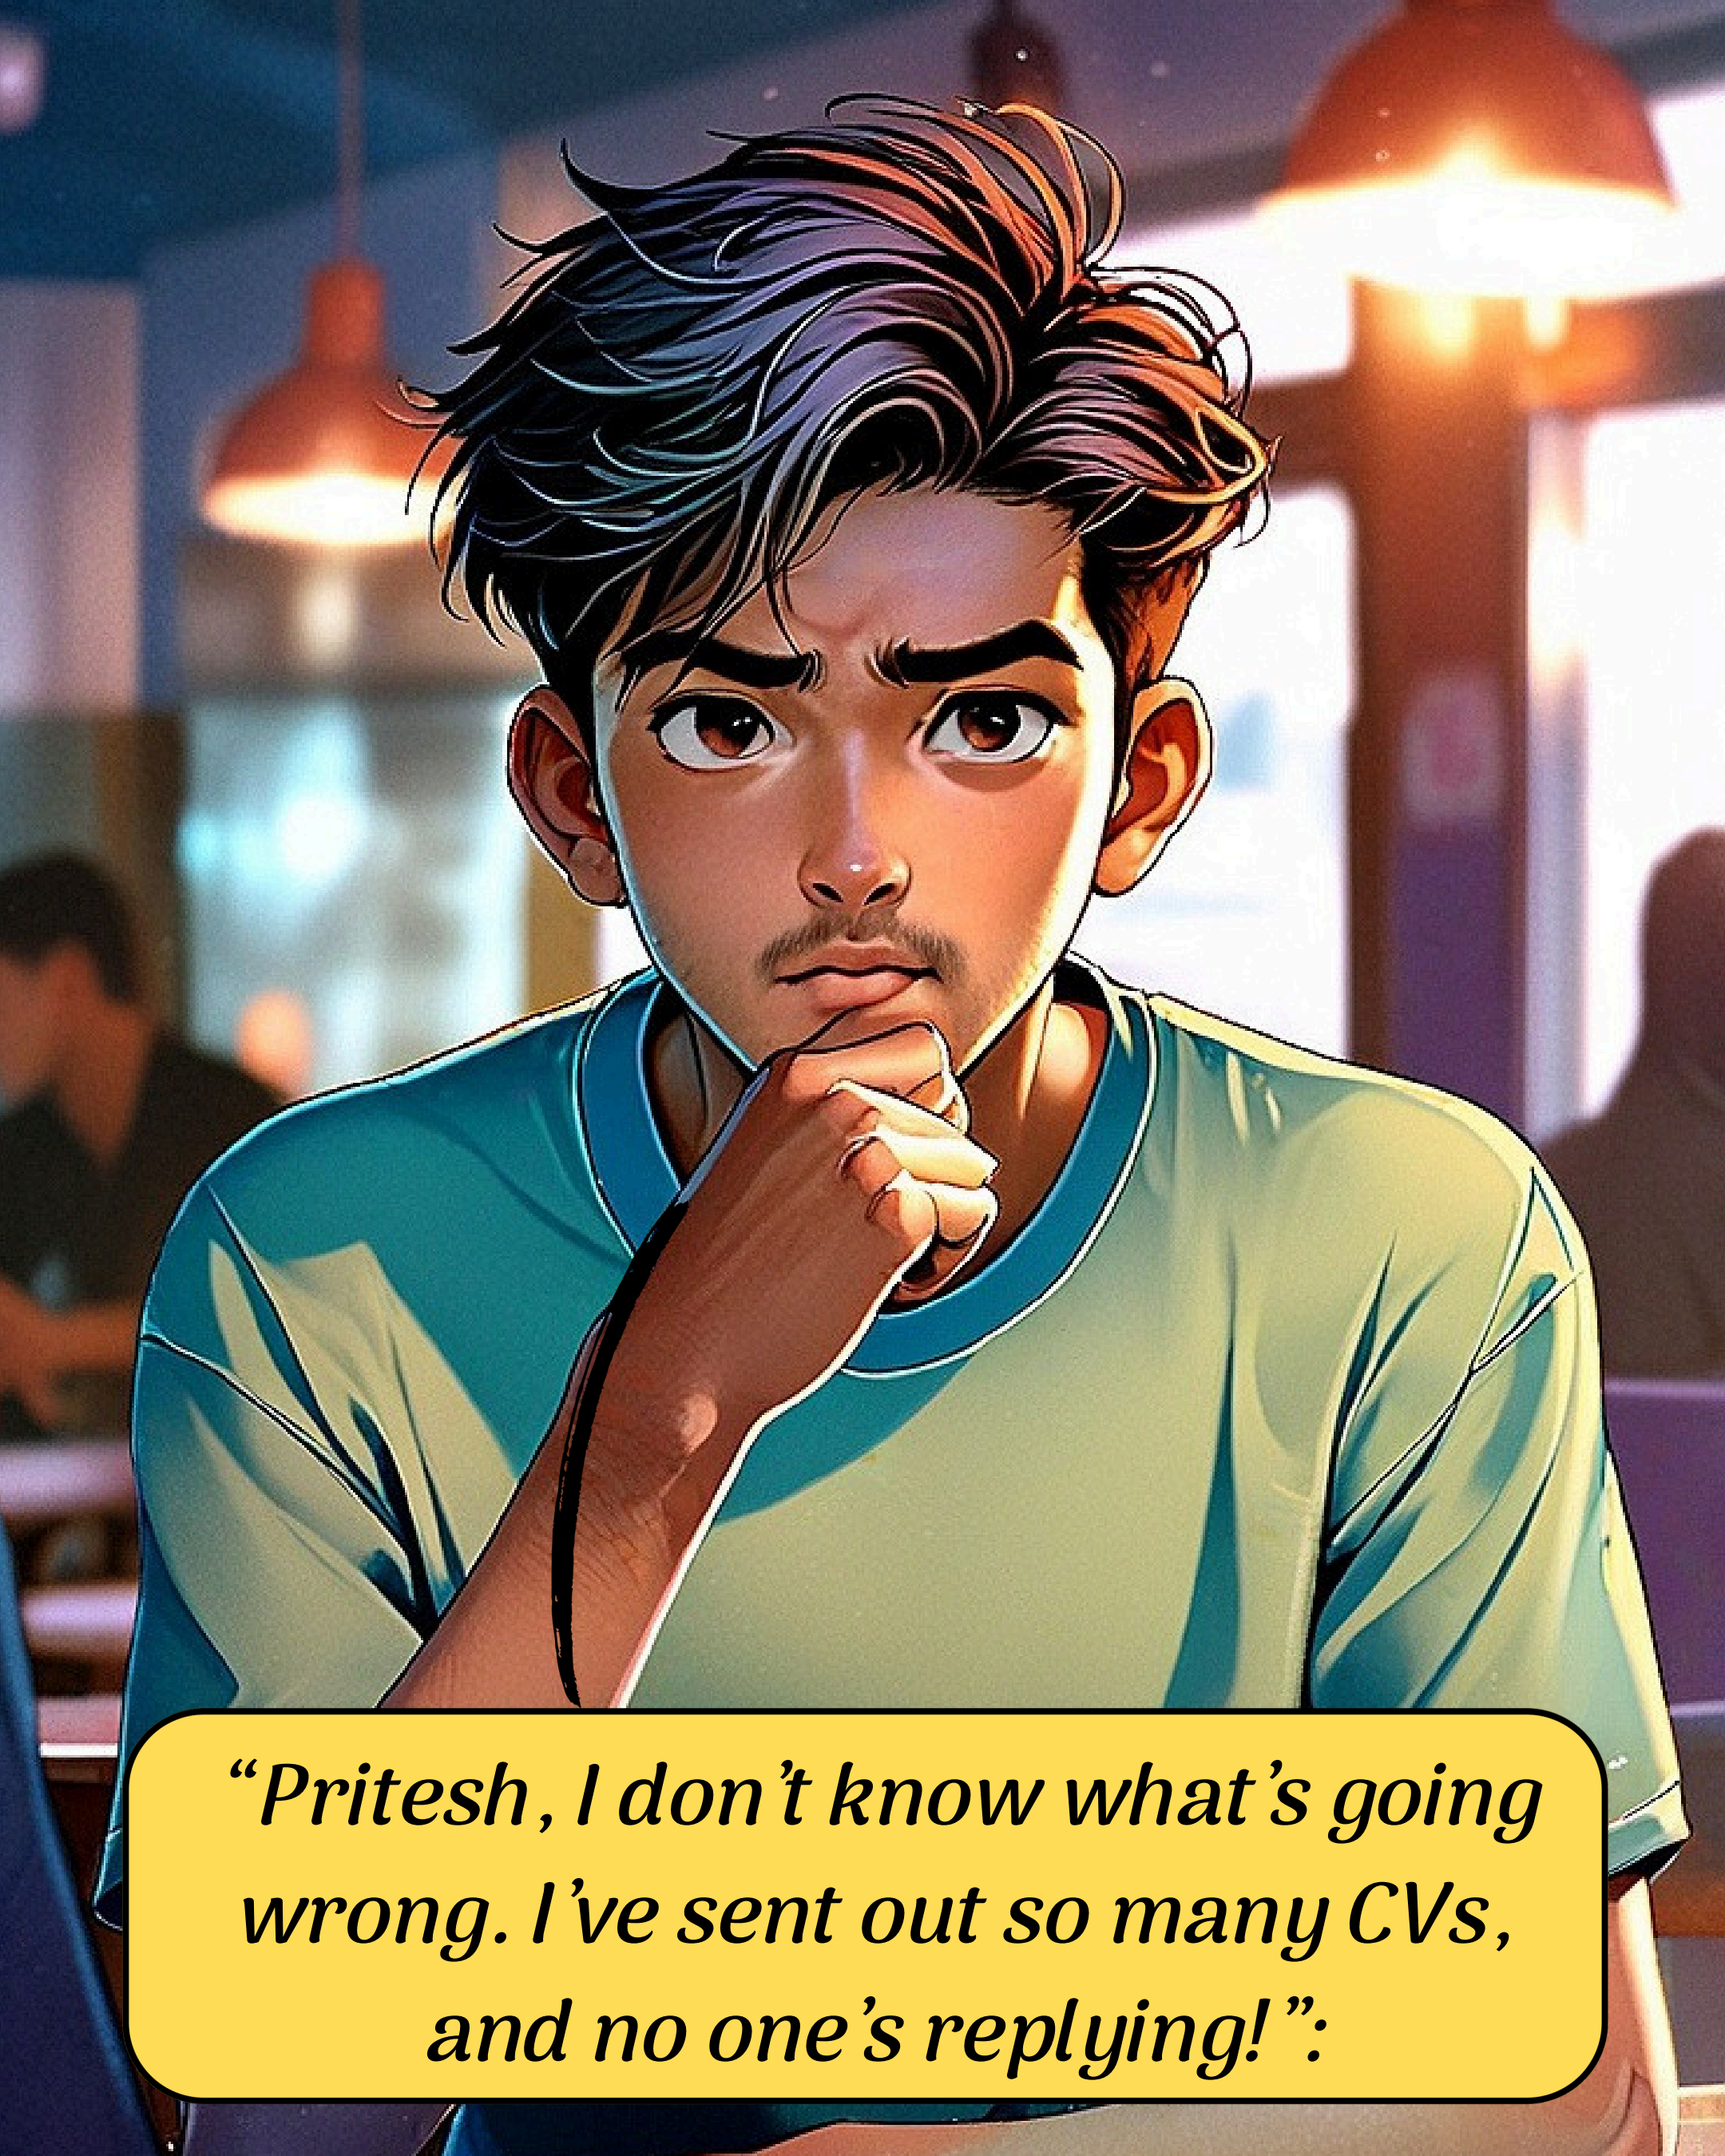
Episode 1

A cozy coffee shop. Pritesh sits across from a stressed-looking student. The student has a laptop and a notebook on the table



“Pritesh, I don’t know what’s going wrong. I’ve sent out so many CVs, and no one’s replying!”:

“Alright, let’s break this down. When was the last time you updated your CV?”

“Uh… maybe a year ago? But it has all my skills and projects!”

“And are you tailoring it for each job?”

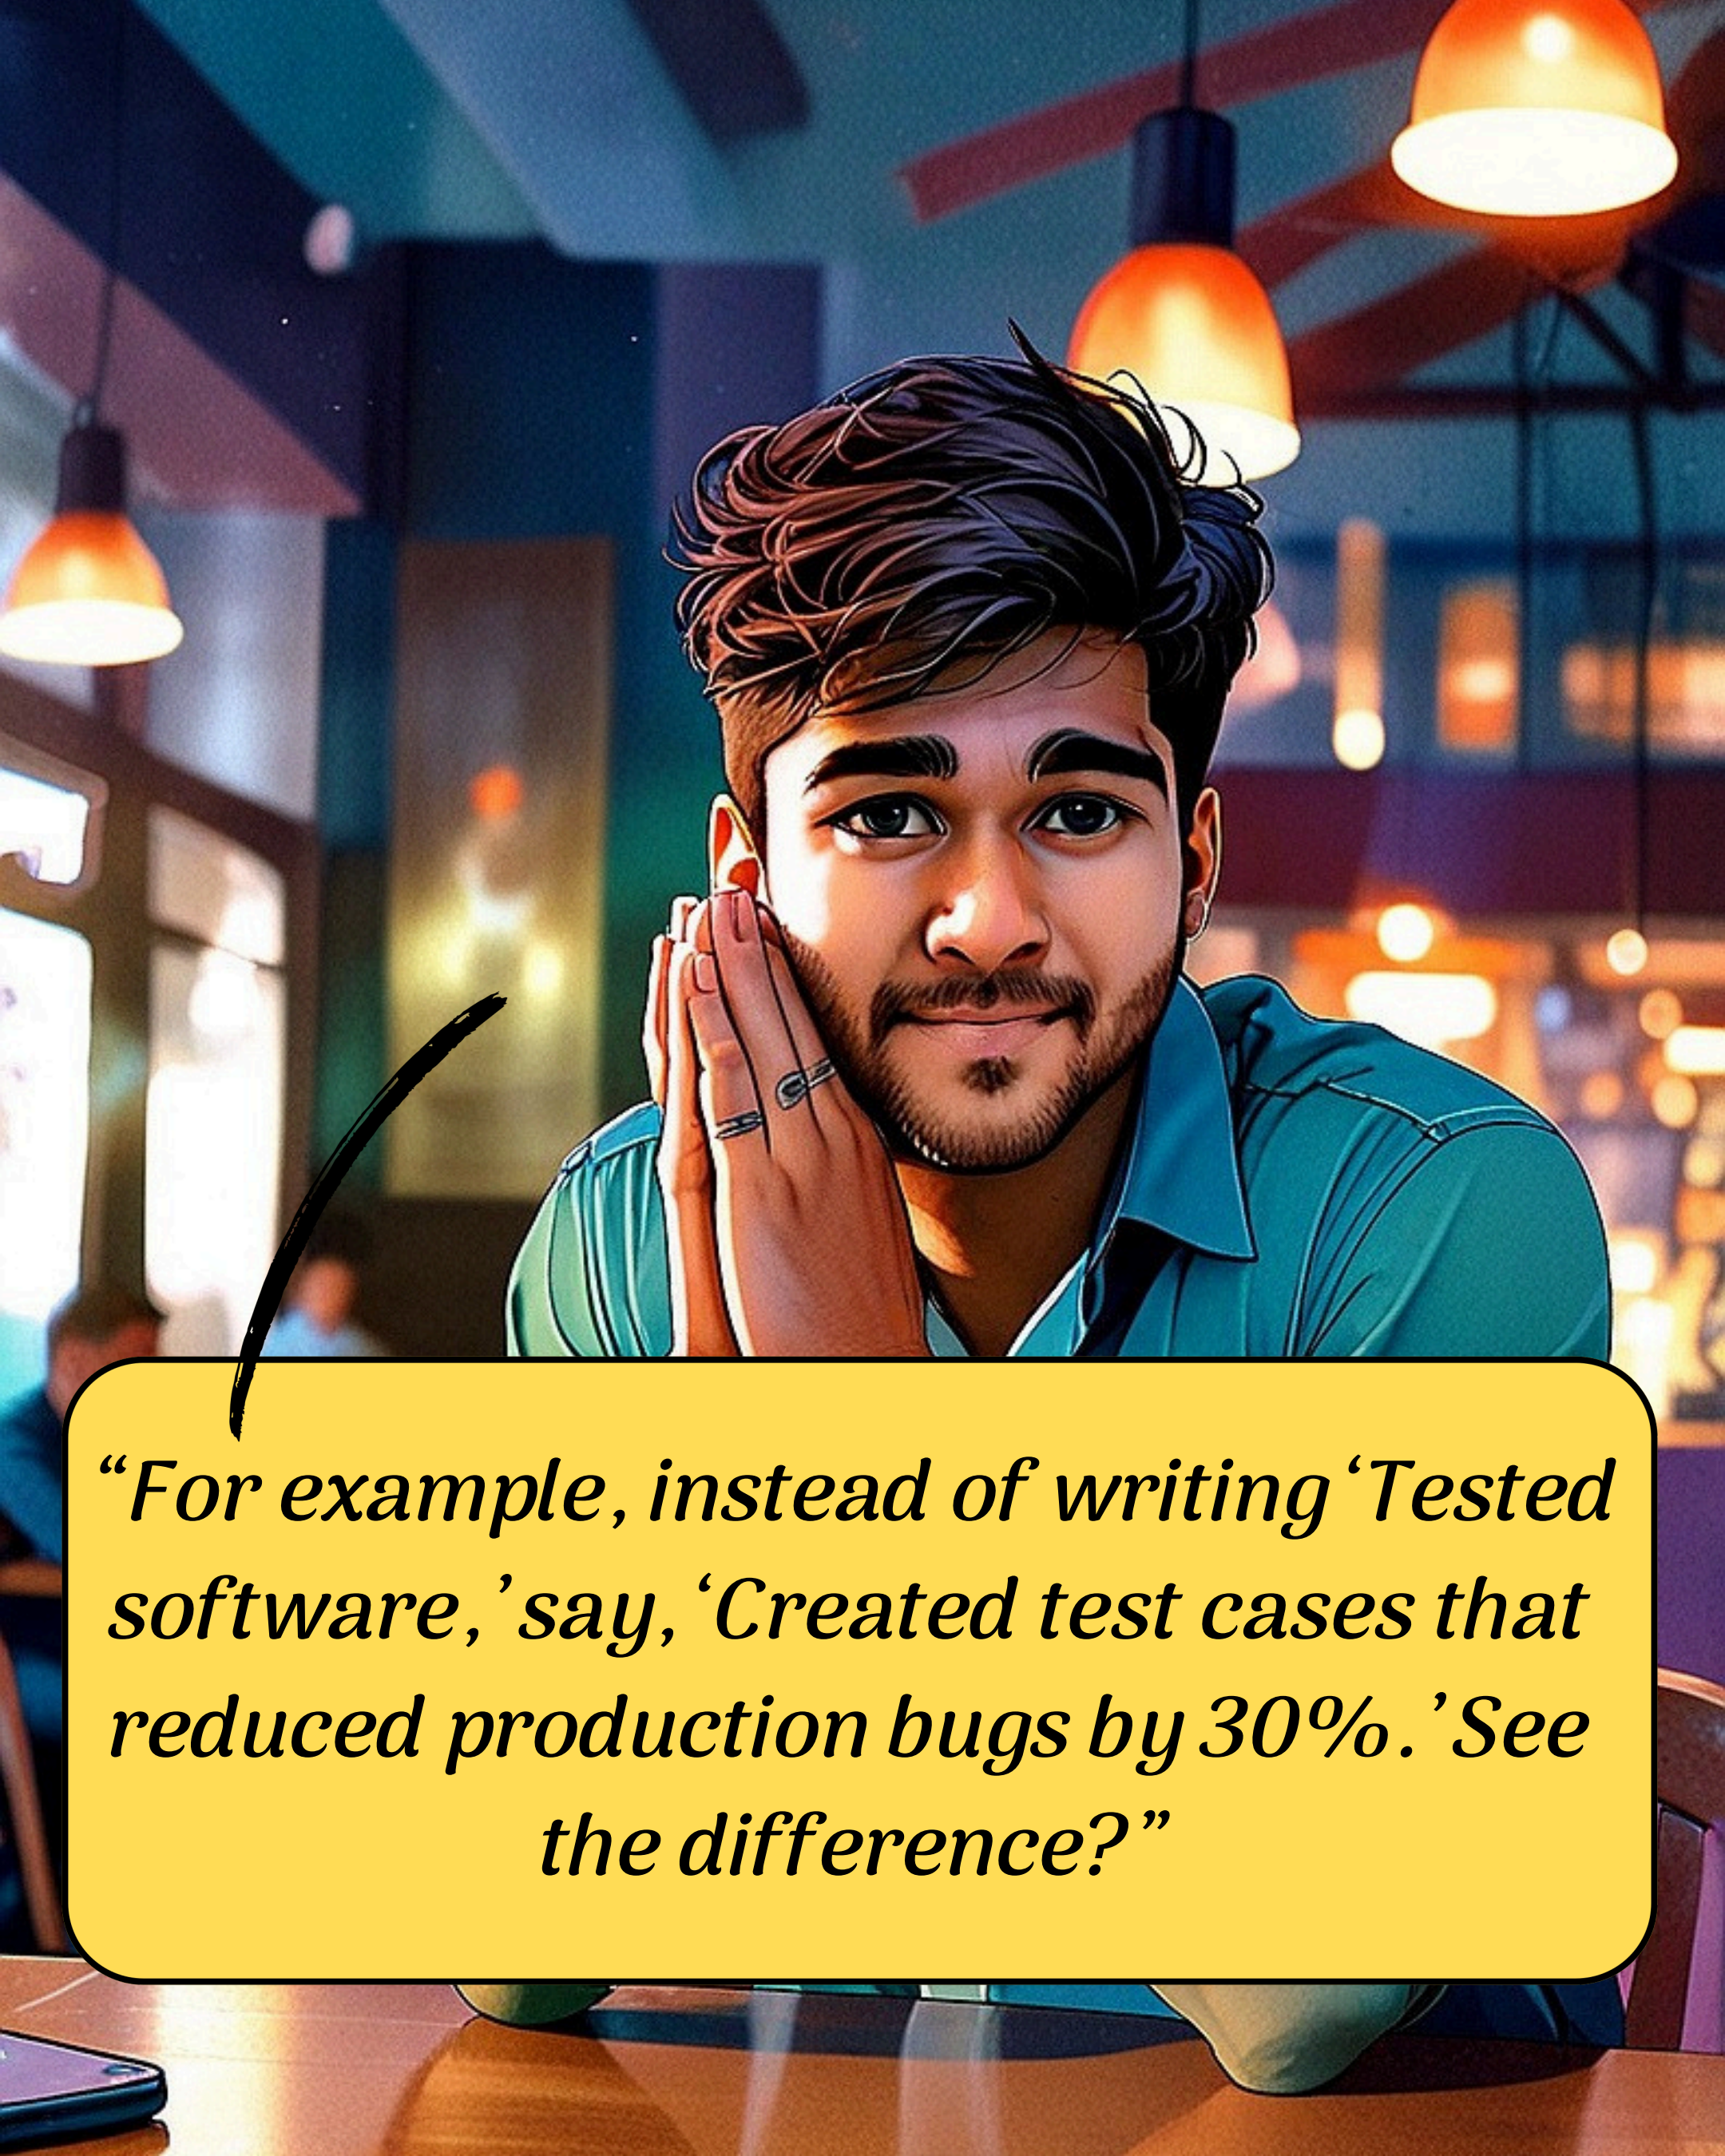
“Tailoring? You mean, like… changing things? Isn’t one CV enough?”

“That’s your first problem. Think of your CV as a pitch. Would you use the same pitch for every customer?”

“Ohhh, so I need to tweak it depending on the job?”

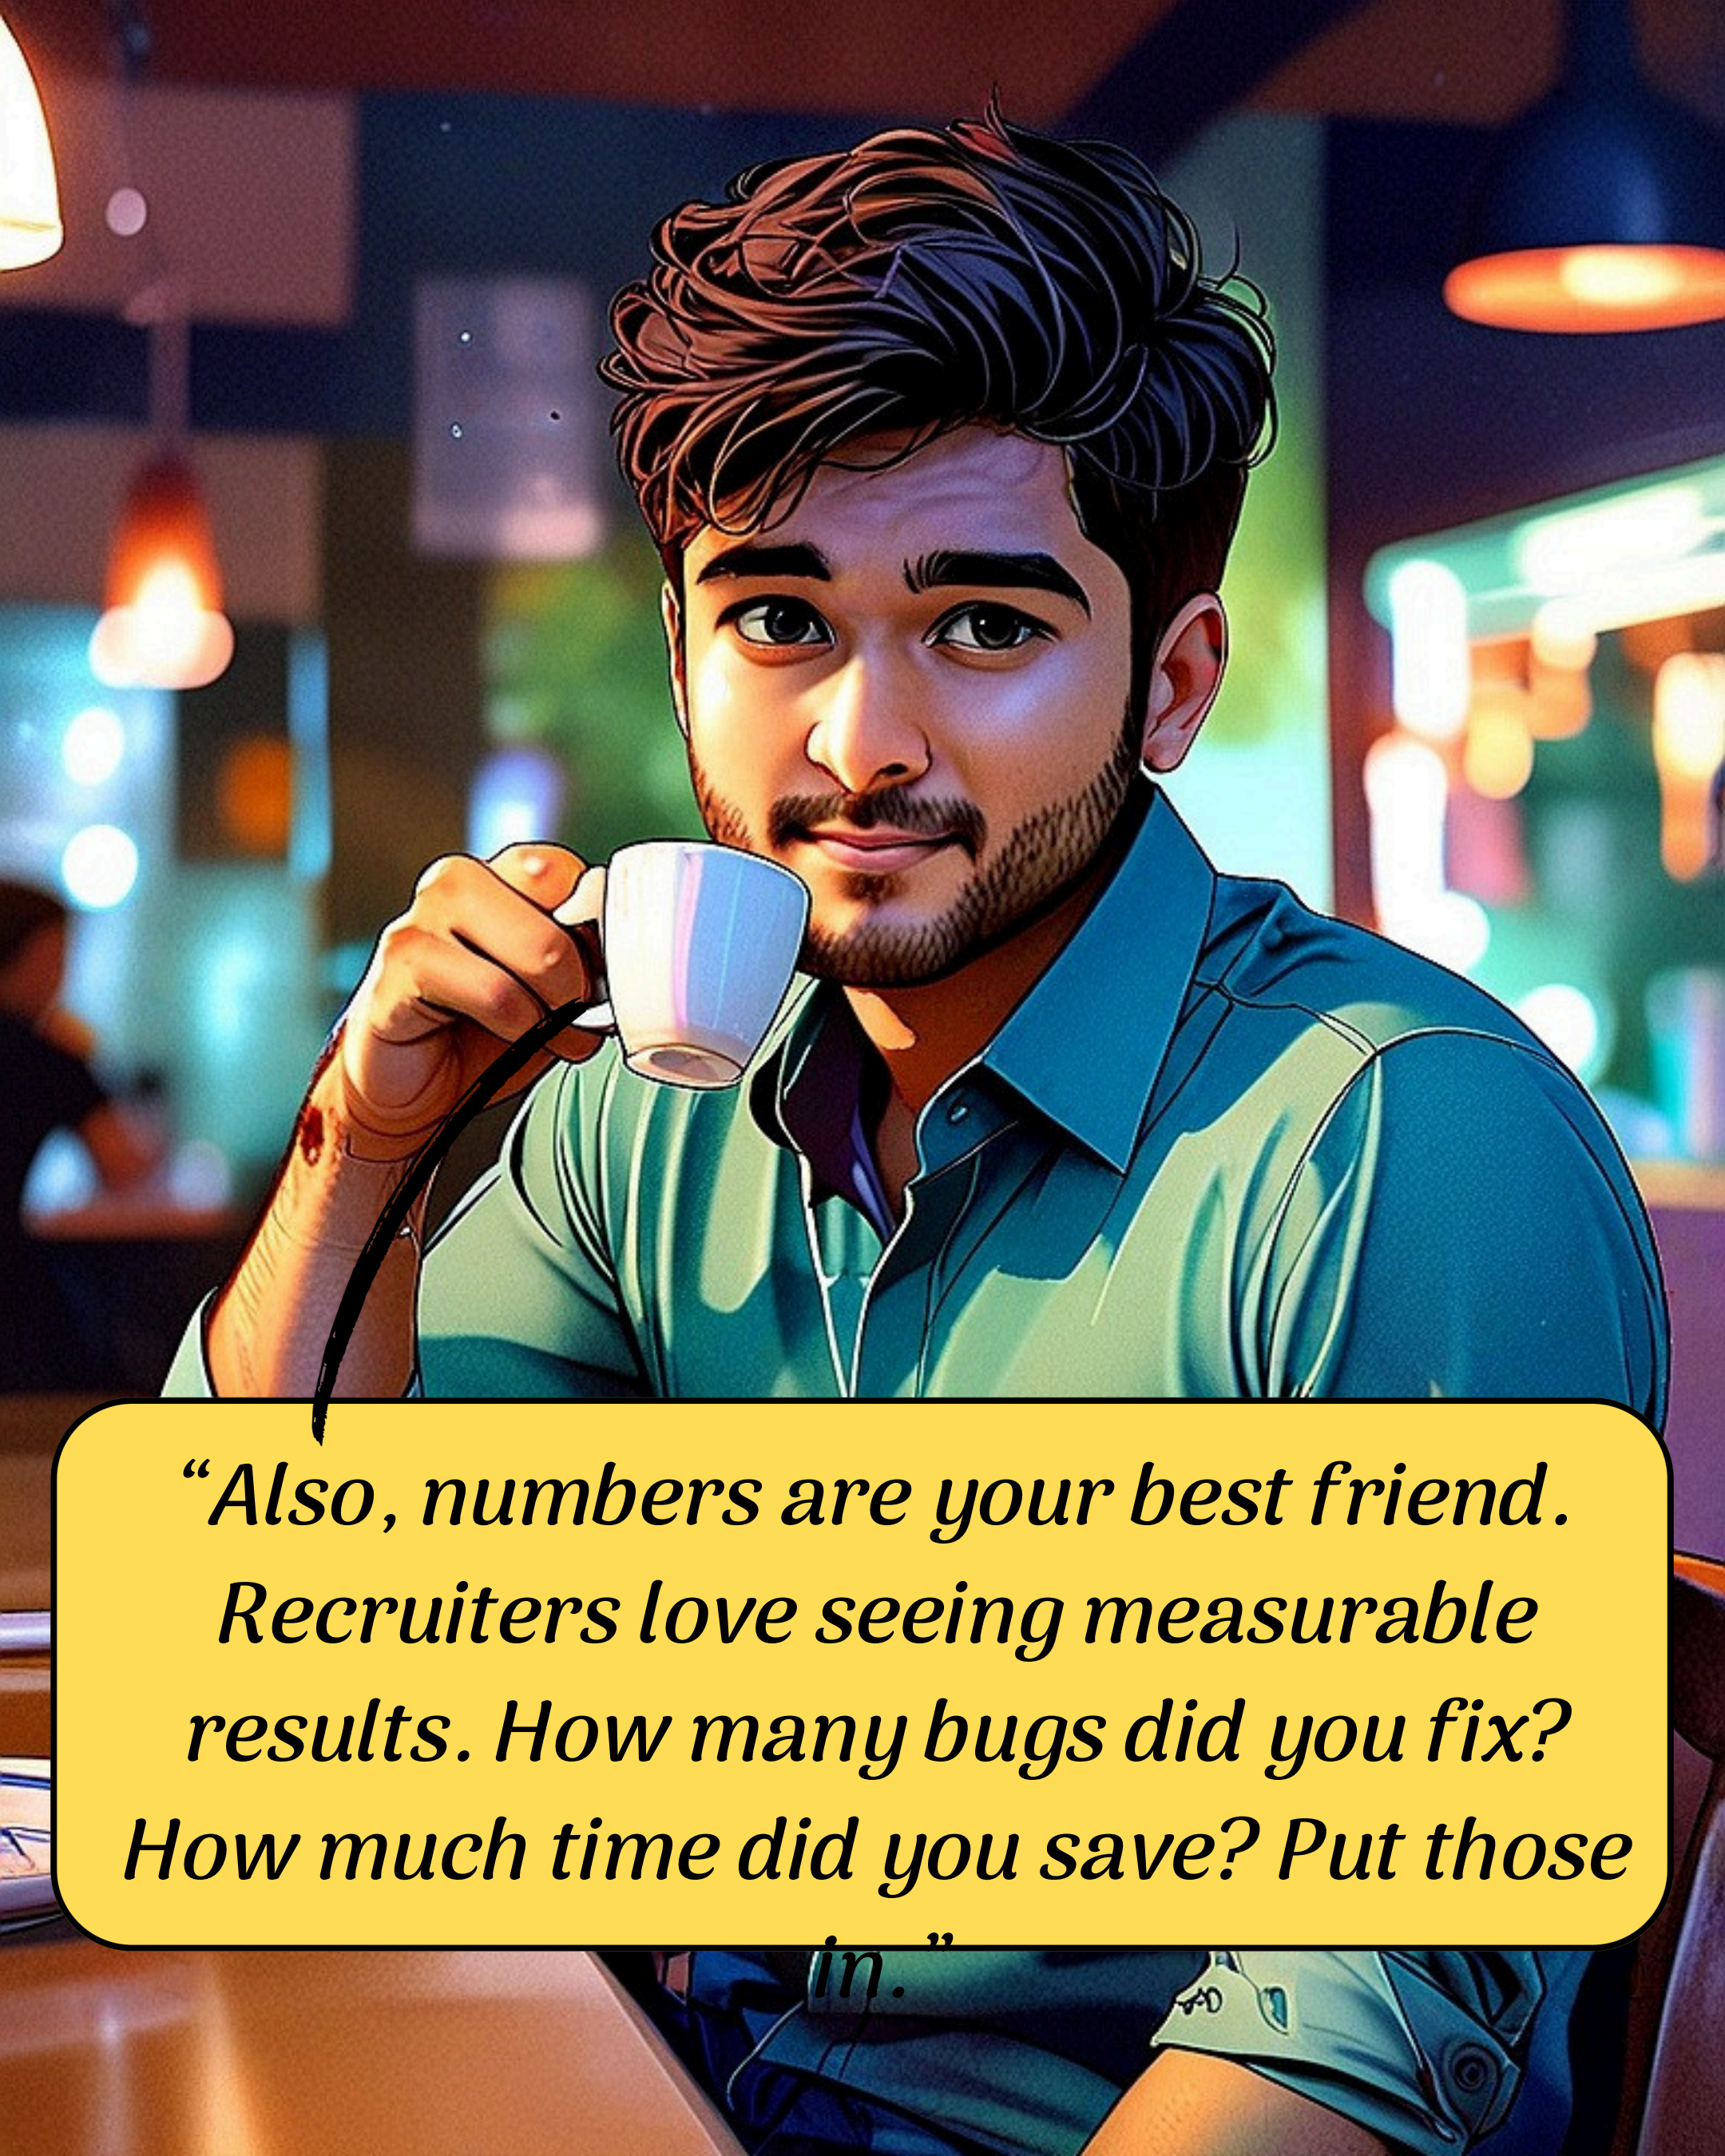
“Exactly. Highlight the skills and achievements that match the job description. And don’t just list responsibilities—focus on what you accomplished.”

“What do you mean by accomplishments?”



“For example, instead of writing ‘Tested software,’ say, ‘Created test cases that reduced production bugs by 30%.’ See the difference?”

“That makes it sound so much stronger!”



“Also, numbers are your best friend. Recruiters love seeing measurable results. How many bugs did you fix? How much time did you save? Put those in.”

“Right! Numbers. Got it. Anything else?”

“Yes—networking. Are you active on LinkedIn?”

“Uh… not really. I just scroll sometimes.”

“That’s like going to a party and standing in the corner! Start engaging. Share your knowledge, comment on posts, and connect with people in your field.”

“Okay, I’ll give it a shot. Tailored CVs, measurable impact, and LinkedIn networking. Anything else?”

“That’s a solid start. And remember your job search is your project. Plan, execute, and don’t give up!”
